There is a need for a sustainable transition to a low-carbon economy. This requires employee participation! The requirements of the climate movement and trade unions can go hand in hand with the motto: sustainable and social.

Because sustainability must be socially just. Good facilities such as public transport, sufficient and qualitative care and education, affordable energy, public space mean quality jobs and offer quality of life to people.

The struggle against growing inequality and climate disruption go hand in hand: that is why fair taxes are necessary.

- A just transition with social dialogue, decent work and income, respect for human rights, strong social protection and international solidarity
- A world in which equality, solidarity and respect prevail for people, future generations and the limits of nature
- higher responsibility of companies , in particular the most polluting: it is not by putting the burden on the shoulders of the individual, that we arrive at a just and social transition

We need to accelerate our efforts: that's what I want that's what we want: I'm participating!
